

English instructor gives out 'A'

An English instructor at Grossmont College has given a student grade of "A" for his work in the previous semesters. This was the first time that such an award has been given by an English instructor at Grossmont College.

The student, Piere A. Graph, was elated with the news. "I couldn't believe it myself," he said, "I never thought I would get an 'A', especially since I dropped an apostrophe at the end of a possessive noun."

Despite his error at the beginning of the semester, Piere managed to show enough talent and skill to avoid going credit/ no credit.

When asked for advice on how other students on this campus might be able to earn an "A" in English Piere said, "You have to plan it out from the beginning of the semester. Carefully pick the instructor you want to take English from in the following semester. Make it a point to run into him or her. As soon as you have become acquainted, start talking about the last novel you read."

Another tip from Piere is to take the class "English for the Non-English Speaking." It apparently worked for Piere—he has the grade to prove it.
